The COVID-19 pandemic serves as a wake-up call for the South Korean government to modernize their official position on the dog meat trade. COVID-19 is a zoonotic disease – one that originated with animals and was transferred to humans. Dogs that are bred for their meat are kept in crowded pens and subjected to stress, unnatural nutrition and poor sanitation – a receptive breeding ground for the next zoonotic disease. As an example, the novel canine influenza A H3N2 virus, first detected in 2007 at a dog farm located in the city of Gimpo, South Korea, has been quickly spreading, even to overseas, undergoing frequent reassortments and getting closer to humans.

Actor and director Clint Eastwood, a signatory to the letter, stated: “In my lifetime, I have seen many things progress, evolve and change. Now is the time for South Korea to evolve and end their dog meat trade.”

“South Korea’s breeding, slaughter and consumption of dog is a brutal and unhealthy tradition that must end,” said Chris DeRose, President & Founder of Last Chance for Animals. “These dogs are no different from companion animals we keep in our homes. They have a right to a life free from fear and cruel treatment. We call upon President Moon to continue modernizing South Korea and take decisive steps toward ending the Dog Meat Trade.”

South Korea trails China in its outlook on dog meat. China recently took decisive action to curtail their dog meat trade by removing dogs from the government’s official livestock list. The South Korean government pledged to remove dogs from their livestock list in 2018, but has failed to fulfill that promise.

To this day, South Korea is still the only country in the world where dogs are systematically bred and raised for consumption. In 3 thousand dog farms, a million dogs are born, raised and slaughtered every year. Most of these dogs are killed in preparation for Boknal, the hottest days of the Korean summer when the consumption of dog meat soup, known as “Boshingtang” increases to combat the extreme heat.

“It is time that the South Korean government put an end to the country’s notorious and dangerous dog meat trade by banning dog slaughter and trade for consumption” added Jiyeon Lee, Co-President and Founder of Animal Liberation Wave based in Seoul. “Such a move is sure to save millions of dogs from suffering while protecting the population from a possible outbreak of a new zoonotic disease.”
